A global growth dilemma faced by investors.

US-based megacap tech companies have been so successful over the past 20 years they now dominate US and global indices, and many investment portfolios.

This leaves many investors highly exposed to a hiccup in the AI narrative. However, diversifying away from megacap tech risks lowering long-term returns.

WCM, however, is not afraid of doing things differently.

Introducing WCM Select Global Growth Equity Fund

It is a high conviction fund which concentrates WCM's best ideas into an all-cap, global growth strategy focused on finding companies primed for accelerated share price growth. The fund is ahead of its global equities benchmark MSCI All Country World Index¹ since inception and has achieved this with different stocks, and relatively lower exposure to US megacap tech².

Highly differentiated global equities exposure

The fund is highly concentrated in 30-50 stocks, which are typically different to US and global indices. This often makes the fund complementary to investors' existing global equities holdings.

High growth potential

WCM only invests in companies it believes are widening their competitive advantage and where this change is not appreciated by the market. WCM calls these "narrative inflections". WCM believes companies at these inflection points could potentially experience long periods of accelerated share price growth as the market realises their potential.

Unique focus on culture

WCM believes that culture separates great companies from merely good ones, but very few investors appreciate this. Before investing, WCM's in-house cultural analysts rigorously research each company to decide whether it has the right culture to succeed in its growth aspirations. WCM believes its own culture is part of its competitive advantage.
